Most Americans, 80 percent, identify themselves as religious or spiritual, the report said. Among Americans who give, more than half – 55 percent – say their commitment to religion is an important or very important motivation for charitable giving.

Valerie Cooper, 61, of Churubusco said while she is more likely to give to religious charities, what really tugs at her heart strings is feeding hungry children, whether in the U.S. or in another country.

"I contribute to Feed the Children and World Vision," she said.

The Cooper family also makes regular contributions to sponsor a child in Bangladesh, she said.

World Vision and Feed the Children are both Christian humanitarian organizations.

Irieta Coleman, 89, of Fort Wayne, said she had to stop many of the charitable donations she was making after her
